Justice for Immigrants

Some say that letting in too many immigrants, because they are often a cheap source of labor, could hurt the wages of workers already in the country. Is this known to be true?

Immigrant workers generally do not compete with U.S. workers for unskilled jobs. Some studies show that immigrant workers may have an impact on the job status and wages of low-skilled American workers, such as high school dropouts. Overall, however, immigrant workers fill crucial jobs in important industries that many Americans will not do, such as agriculture. By enacting immigration reform, the wages of immigrant workers will increase because they will be better able to assert their rights in the workplace and because the pool of unauthorized workers will dwindle.

Dear Parishioners,

As it turned out, last week we saw only a partial list of those who contributed so generously to last year's Cardinal's Appeal 2009. This week we see those whose names did not appear last week. Theirs also is the pride and gratitude that Holy Child Parish has for all participants. Please consider making your name appear in the 2010 list that is currently being generated by pledging support to what is now known as:
